

THE VAULT · CHECKLIST

The Interview

The questions you will be asked, and how to meet them.

Interviews for private roles are less about your CV and more about whether you can be trusted in an intimate, high-stakes environment. Below are the questions that come up most, and the spirit in which to answer them.

“Tell me about yourself.”

Keep it brief and composed. One line on your background, one on what defines your service (discretion, anticipation), one on why this world. They are reading your calm, not your CV.

“How do you handle confidential information?”

This is the most important question you will be asked. Show that discretion is instinctive, not a rule you follow. Never illustrate with a real example that reveals a past principal, that itself is the wrong answer.

“Describe a difficult situation and how you resolved it.”

Choose a moment where you protected someone's time, peace, or privacy. Emphasise that you resolved it before it became visible. Stay humble, the hero of the story is their peace of mind, not you.

“How do you anticipate needs?”

Give one small, specific illustration of noticing something unspoken and quietly acting on it. Small gestures reveal more than grand ones.

“Are you willing to travel / relocate / work irregular hours?”

Answer honestly. This world rewards flexibility, but a boundary stated calmly and early is far better than resentment later.

“Why should we trust you with our home and our lives?”

Do not oversell. A composed, sincere answer about the responsibility you feel, and the discretion you live by, lands better than enthusiasm.

Before you walk in

- Dress impeccably but never flashily, you are the frame, not the picture.
- Arrive composed and early. Your calm is your first credential.
- Prepare two thoughtful questions about the household's needs, not about pay or perks.
- Silence your phone entirely. A single interruption undoes an hour of trust.
- Bring a printed CV on quality paper, discreetly presented.

Remember: they are not hiring skills, they are hiring a person they can trust in their most private moments. Everything you do in the room is the real interview.
